Facing the Unknown Together

The movement of the Symposium Programme this year is from hearing the voices of others on the theme of 'Facing the Unknown' on day one; to engaging with those at their own adventurous 'edge of unknowing' on day two; to opening the conversation to all of us on day three.

On the third day, we may discover what arises when we face the unknown in the microcosm of the world we have created by coming together here. Thus, this day has no agenda. It is for conversation, for expressing and listening to our reactions and responses to what we have been experiencing here in the symposium and for being together in the light of truth.

There is a commitment to enabling all who want to be heard; to listening actively to others as well as ourselves; to 'waiting in the light' until moved to speak; above all, perhaps to a spirit of good faith and belief in the possibilities of expression.

It is an endeavour of political, cultural and social significance to hear different, perhaps quieter, voices. It requires commitment to bring ourselves as fully as we can to the task of meeting each other with awareness in the moment.

We may notice the ways in which we keep ourselves safe in this world, and therefore separate, and to risk fuller and more fearless connection. The focus is on the place between inner and outer; the place which is mirrored in self, group and world. To meet with such awareness is the challenge of our time. May we learn much from our efforts to be together, and trust the process, however it unfolds.
